CHAPTER XIV. It was well for Constance Corbyn that her companion had had some experience in travelling, for the confusion upon the arrival of the train at Southampton Docks appeared to her to be ove whelming. In half-an-hour, however they were in possession of their little cabin on board the Mandalan, and Constance, who at one time had despaired of getting their trunks out of the chaos of baggage, found that they had all their belongings safely collected. For half-an-hour she assisted Annette in putting things tidy and then the latter said, "The bell has rung and visitors have gone ashore, so we shall be starting at once. You had better run on deck, dear, and see what there is to be seen. I will finish putting things to rights." When Constance reached the deck she found that the vessel was being warped out of the dock, while asmall crowd of people moved along abreast of her waving their hands and handkerchiefs. She leaned against the bulwarks watching them, and then turned to look at what was going on round about her. As she did so her eves fell upon's young man in a velveteen coat leaning against the bulwarks a few yards away. The face nised it. The expression indeed was strangely altered since she had last seen it. Then it was a light for it than I should have cope if I had some copy was her shelter and so much did the enjoy pression as its owner laughed and chatted with others standing round him : now there was a storn hard look on it. the lips were set and the eyes fixed frowningly on the shore; but Coustance none of it, there is no reason why it should not She waited until she saw her fellow passenger was certain that she was not mistaken. She had be put straight, and I hope the little girl will glance towards her and then held up her hand. LEBIG COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF ME looked so earnestly at the face before that i seemed imprinted in her memory, and indeed : was but a fortnight since she had seen it.

It was Philip Clitherce who stood beside her, and after assuring berself of the fact, Constance turned and walked aft to the foot of the ladder leading up to the poop, and crossed to the other side of the vessel. What did it mean? What was Philip Clitheroe doing on board the Mandalau ! He was avidently a passenger. There was but one explanation of it that she could see, he had deceived his friend Ferris, and while pretending to be perfectly willing to recognise her rights at once. if she could produce any legal proof of her mother's marriage, he had been secretly working. against her. He had had his spies upon her at St. Male, and had had her watched all the time that she was in London.

It was he, no doubt, who had abstracted the leaf of the register, and most likely he knew that she and Robert Harbut had been down is a first rate fellow that and has been awfully ."That was unlucky after escaping so far." there and had discovered that it was missing. Then probably for a time he thought he was safe, but he would have learned from the butcher at Woodstock that she had got upon Merson's traces, and again she had been watched. He could hardly know that she had obtained the address from the woman at Banbury, but as soon as he had learnt that she was starting for Australia, he would guess that she had in some way or other obtained it, and was on her way-to see this man; therefore, he had resolved to go

As doubtless he had supposed that after going down to Folkestone she had given up the search as hopeless, and had taken the position of companion to Miss Peyton with the intention of earning her living in that way, the watch upon her would probably for a time have been abandoned, and he would be ignorant that she had gone down to Bath and might have seen him there. He would then reckon that while he would know her she could have no suspicion whatever of his identity, and he should be able to hoodwink her with the greatest ease.

"He is a monster of deceit," she said angrily to herself: "If anyone had told me at Bath that he was a villain I should have laughed at the idea. It looked such a frank, honest face. and I was absolutely fool enough for a moment to fancy-" and she flushed up hetly at the remembrance that she had for a moment thought we get outside the island." that Miss Peyton's hint as to the way in which matters might be settled satisfactorily to both parties would not be so repugnant to her as it had seemed when it was mooted.

"The man has two fuces," she said : "the one a girl. Well, I am forewarned now, and can fight him with his own weapons, and he will not feel that it was a providential one indeed. No had things enough to look after, and that alannuity when he knew all along where my mother's marriage had taken place. I was to have a sop thrown me to keep me quiet.
